

“Dear Ann Landers: I read your column about widows whose husbands had very little life insurance, or in some cases none at all. Some of those widows were bitter because their husbands did not have life insurance. However, in my case, I was the guilty party.

Our auto and home insurance agent had offered us life insurance, however, we always had other bills to pay. I was the one who said, “No, we can’t afford life insurance.” There was the house payment, car payments, and something always had to be fixed around the house. I did not think we had enough money to pay for a life insurance policy. I thought my husband would live forever, now I am a widow.

Last week, I found out that I could have had a $100,000 life insurance policy on my husband for only about $20.00 a month. We could have afforded that! I now have to sell our home and trade in my nice car for an older and less expensive model.

Today, I am waiting tables at a local restaurant trying to make enough money to survive. I wished I had bought the policy; we really could have afforded it!
